What sort of timeline does the academic job market operate on? How can you be strategic about your fields of study? How do you select letter writers? What do job applications actually require? What sort of language do they use? How can you set yourself up for success long before you go on the market? This talk will be an introduction to the basics of the academic job world to help those considering academic careers in the humanities start thinking about how to strategize well ahead of time and be aware of what the market can look like.
